This book provides a comprehensive and much-needed study of cluster policies in Europe. It focuses on one very important element that has so far been disregarded in the literature, namely, the extent to which the complex dynamics of multi-level governance are responding to the problems and challenges faced by clusters. This book offers a critical appraisal and comparative analysis of cluster policies, focusing on Germany, Italy, the UK, the Czech Republic, Romania, and Slovenia, whilst examining their firms, institutions, and multi-level governance patterns.
